Another week has passed, and with it has come many exciting developments for our project regarding what I have done and what my teammates have been doing. Starting with my developments so far, I created more images based on the slides created by the research team, which I have included in this repository. I also adjusted some of the slides from earlier, replacing the sliding bar scale with my new leaf system that would give users five leaves to choose from. One leaf is the “unsatisfied” or “unhappy” leaf, and five leaves represent “very satisfied” or “very happy.” Our meeting last Wednesday, October 18, was very successful, not only in team bonding but helping to present our work to each other. Kaisha has done an excellent job incorporating my designs into a much cleaner interface, which I am incredibly grateful for, and her refined artistic eyes have helped a lot. We also discussed more about what we want to send in an email to the people from All-Nations we spoke to, and I sent a rough idea outline to Michael Rohd over Discord. We have already reached the halfway mark, and with each passing day, the app becomes more and more tangible and within our grasp. and I’m excited to see how our finished beta will look.
